Statement of Vivian Romero

Thank you all for being here today. I want to begin by expressing my deep gratitude to Attorney Gloria Allred for her unwavering support and tireless advocacy. Her commitment to ensuring that our voices are heard—both in the media and within the justice system—has been truly invaluable.

She has stood by us and so many other victims when the criminal justice system failed to protect us from Nathaniel Radimak, also known as the “Tesla road rage driver.”

Despite the severity of his crimes, Mr. Radimak was released on parole after serving less than a year of a five-year prison sentence and is now alleged to have committed two counts of third-degree assault.

Had he served a sentence of five years in California, these new attacks on women might have been prevented. I believe that these incidents were a foreseeable consequence of a system that repeatedly failed to address his pattern of violent behavior.

Some repeat offenders, unfortunately, may not be rehabilitated even when given second chances. Under the circumstances, I think that Mr. Radimak poses a serious danger to the public. In closing, I extend my sympathy and support to those who allege they have been attacked or threatened in California and Hawaii. I will continue to fight for justice and stand in solidarity with every person affected by his actions.
